Cowboy Drugstore Traces of a kleptocrat from Iraq to Delaware to Miami

BY ZACK KOPPLIN DECEMBER 7, 2021

Masrour Barzani, Iraqi Kurdistan prime minister and owner of a Miami building housing a CVS

This article appears in the November/December 2021 issue of The American Prospect magazine.

A few blocks from the water, in the heart of Miamis glitzy South Beach, is a drugstore not like the others. Tourists buying sunscreen and straw hats from the CVS on Washington Avenue are financing a Middle Eastern kleptocrat.

The plexiglass building housing the roughly 12,000-square-foot pharmacy is worth $18.3 million and, because of favorable rent terms negotiated with CVS, should generate significant profit for its landlord. In 2019, based on Miami property records, local press credited a Virginia-based real estate company, KLNБ, with purchasing the building. But the Virginia firms inclusion in the property registrar was a diversion. “KLNБ is not the owner of this property and had no involvement in the transaction,” a company representative said.

The actual purchase was made by an anonymous Delaware shell company. Buried in incorporation documents for this Delaware companys Florida branch is the name of the buildings real owner: Masrour Barzani, the prime minister of Iraqi Kurdistan.

More from Zack Kopplin

A semi-independent region in Iraqs north, Kurdistan is a hereditary monarchy in all but name and has been dominated by the Barzani family for decades. The Kurdish prime minister has abused his power to attack, torture, and kill his critics, including Saudi-style assassinations of journalists. While he previously served as the regions intelligence chief, Barzani had a local university student, Zardasht Osman, tortured and killed for publishing a satirical poem about the social advancement that would come with marrying one of the prime ministers sisters.

The Kurdish prime minister is not a benign pharmacy operator. But because of Americas underappreciated role as an enabler of corporate secrecy, if not for a clerical error, South Beach residents would have no idea about the Washington Avenue CVS.

No one knows the extent of the illicit wealth hidden inside the United States. Corporate secrecy laws, maintained by states like Delaware, keep it that way. But tracing the Barzani familys investments, like this Miami pharmacy, explains why America has become an appealing destination for dirty money.

THROUGH OIL AND CORRUPTION, the Barzanis, whose agents did not respond to requests for comment, have amassed enormous amounts of wealth. For example, a real estate investment in Kurdistan, owned by a company secretly connected to one of the prime ministers brothers, has been valued at $1.27 billion. Like other despots, the Barzanis turned to secrecy havens, the kind of places exposed by the Panama and Pandora Papers, to conceal their money.

Secrecy havens are jurisdictions that dont require public disclosure of the names of the owners and shareholders of companies housed within their borders. This enables all sorts of financial crimes, from tax evasion to money laundering and facilitating bribery. But, unlike the king of Jordan and Argentinas former president, whose secret companies got busted in previous offshore leaks, Barzani assets and business deals were not exposed in the Panama and Pandora Papers.

Theyve only been caught in one major leak, a database of Dubai property records, obtained by the nonprofit Center for Advanced Defense Studies, which contains details about the Barzanis assets in the uber-expensive Burj Khalifa complex and one of the citys artificial islands, Palm Jumeirah, along with the familys connections to United Arab Emirates royalty.

This is because instead of Cayman Island beaches, the Barzanis opted for an office building in Delaware owned by the CT Corporation, an American branch of a Dutch company, Wolters Kluwer, that specializes in creating anonymous companies.

Though less picturesque, Americas corporate secrecy regime is virtually equivalent to what is offered by any Caribbean island. In many states, rather than disclosing real ownership, wealthy individuals can hire agents and representatives to put their names and addresses on corporate paperwork instead, or arent required to supply ownership information at all. A network of accountants, law firms, and consultants, like Wolters Kluwer, will set up and manage these secret companies for anyone who can pay.

The Barzanis have enough secret property, which also includes mansions in California and Virginia, that theyve now been caught hiding money in America four times. Collectively, the family has paid over $75 million for these four properties alone. These investments likely represent only a small fraction of the familys secret wealth in the United States. None of these properties were discovered through a Panama Papers–style leak. Instead, all four properties, which had proxy owners and expensive law firms to protect them, were only unmasked because their agents made small slipups.

Tracing the Barzani family investments explains why America has become an appealing destination for dirty money.

In the case of the CVS, it was a Pennsylvania-based law firm, Cozen OConnor, that appears to have exposed their own secret client. Over two months, beginning in December 2018, the law firm opened three Florida companies and a Delaware company all named after the pharmacy Washington Avenue address. The paperwork for the Florida companies included the Kurdish prime ministers name and signature, along with that of one of his other brothers, Muksi Barzani.

Those names were not meant to become public and, shortly after the pharmacy purchase, the law firm removed them from the companies. The Barzanis were replaced with one of Cozen OConnors own lawyers, Matthew Weinstein. It wasnt a perfect solution, but this legal triage was highly effective. You wont find their names in popular corporation research databases, and it was enough to fool local journalists.

The CVS deal also highlights how far corporate lawyers will go to defend their wealthy dictator clients. When called for comment, Weinstein categorically denied that the Barzanis owned the building or were clients of Cozen OConnor. Instead, he said the corporate documents held by the Florida secretary of state were incorrect. (Later, in response to follow-up questions, Weinstein denied saying any of the things that he had previously said. "If you choose to write an article about the Barzani family, your characterization of my response to you must be 'Mr. Weinstein would not comment on these matters,'" he wrote in an email.)

His statements were all over the place, but Weinstein's core claim, that the Florida secretary of state's records were wrong, is implausible. The names of the Kurdish prime minister and his relatives don't just randomly end up all over incorporation documents for multiple Florida companies for no reason. "The name is a significant piece of the corporate registry," said Robert Appleton, a former senior prosecutor for the Department of Justice. These documents were prepared by Cozen OConnor and many were signed by Weinstein personally. Submitting falsified documents to the Florida corporate registrar is a felony, but that's essentially what Weinstein claimed his law firm had done, in a last-ditch attempt to conceal the identity of his clients.

Obviously, the Barzanis do not tolerate errors, but it was a similar mistake that exposed their Virginia mansion. It was purchased in 2010, by an anonymous Virginia company put together by a local law firm. For years, Kurdistan watchers had speculated the property belonged to Masrour Barzani, but documentary evidence didn't emerge until someone accidentally allowed the registration for the Virginia company to lapse. Its reinstatement paperwork was signed by the chairman of Ster Group, a Kurdish conglomerate. According to State Department cables published by WikiLeaks, Ster Group is owned by members of the Barzani family. □
